"How popular are museums and galleries nowadays?"

Looking at people nowadays, we may think that almost (all) everyone spends his/her days working and surfing the Net afterwards. Therefore they do not have time or do not want to afford various museums. In order to break this myth I have collected some data regarding visits to national museums and galleries in England.

The chart shows us that such museums and galleries as the British Museum, the National Gallery and the Tate Gallery have had an increasing rate of visitors since 2013. The Natural History Museum and the Science Museum, however, have had a substantial decrease (in) in the m number of visitors starting from 2013.

Comparing the data in the chart, we can see that in 2013 the British Museum had 2.6 million of visitors. However, by 2017 the museum had had a total of 5.6 million of visitors. Furthermore, the Natural History Museum with its respectively big audience (3.7 million in 2013) had lost its visitors by 2017 being 1.9 million.

Analyzing the data, I would give my recommendations to some of the museums. For instance, as the Natural History Museum did not appeal to the audience, I would advise them to show people some shorts of the past and tell some fascinating stories of it. As for the Science Museum, I suppose that showing some experiments to the visitors would be warmly welcomed.

To sum up, it becomes obvious that with a proper approach all of the museums have potential of becoming popular among people of all ages.
